The use of bone components such as fibular plates for hip and ankle fractures, sternal plates for sternal fractures, and long bone plates for long bone fractures are well known in the art. Generally, these types of plates are designed with either a plurality of bone fasteners or an opening in the plate for sliding the bone fasteners into the bone. Although these types of plating systems do provide a solution for the repair and reconstruction of long bones, they are relatively bulky, heavy, and difficult to handle and manipulate. The plate itself, although resilient, is difficult to maneuver with the bone fasteners for placement through bone tissue, due to the size of the plate. It is common for the person treating the fracture to expend a great amount of energy to manipulate the bone component over bone tissue. This leads to frequent operator fatigue and associated risk of possible injury to the patient. In certain circumstances, such as in open wound situations, the plate may be difficult to handle, as the operator may be unable to grasp the plate with the fingers, and will typically utilize a fingerless glove to position the bone component. As a result, there is a need for a bone component for insertion into bone tissue that is easier to handle and manipulate and reduces the amount of operator fatigue, which in turn reduces the risk of possible injury to the patient. Accordingly, a need has been identified in the medical field for an improved device for and method of implantation of a bone component in bone tissue with an improved design of the bone component, which would provide an easier handling and manipulation of the bone component in order to reduce any chance of operator fatigue and related injury to the patient. The present invention relates to an improved device for and method of implantation of a bone component in bone tissue. Specifically, the present invention provides a bone component
