Plastic products such as medical products, food containers, dental health products, household goods and industrial parts are often packaged in containers that allow the consumer to open and re-close the container several times to either gain access to the product or simply to transport the product from one location to another. Often, these containers include a resealable opening. In certain applications, the re-closure feature can be used to preserve the freshness of the product. For example, in a retail environment, the product can be opened and resealed for display purposes, but when the container is initially opened, a gaseous contaminant, such as air or oxygen, enters the container to replace any trapped gases. As a result, when the container is re-closed, the trapped gases can react with the product, causing the product to become stale. In such a situation, the product may be made to a customer, who in turn is advised that the product is no longer fresh. Several techniques are available for preserving the freshness of a product in a container. For example, a rese
