Visit our development blog! Our developer blog will keep you up to date on our progress. We also publish some developer sketches, art, and even video commentary! Support our Official Forums!Come visit our forums! Outdated NewsOur very first game! We've put together a teaser trailer for it as a proof of concept. Don't expect a full-fledged game from us just yet.We'd like to thank! They've been very supportive of our work, and we've learned a lot from them. Some newer news. We're working on something we've been thinking of for a while now. We will soon give more info on what that is, but for now we can tell you that the game will have different genres, a single campaign, will be free-to-play with paid content, and will have Steam achievements. We're very excited about this, and looking forward to bring a new and different gaming experience. Admission of guilt and/or mercy at sentencing by former President Jacob Zuma during the murder trial of President Robert Mugabe's right-hand man, former national police commissioner General Wayne Bvudzijena.The murder trial of Mugabe's former right-hand man Wayne Bvudzijena, who was himself tried for the murder of the Nkandla agricultural workers' dispute in 2007, begins today.Former police commissioner General Bvudzijena, who was allegedly behind the killing of nine people at Marikana, was acquitted by the Western Cape High Court last month. He's being tried for the murder of four comrades who were shot at Marikana in 2012, allegedly at the hands of former Brigadier Siyabonga Mogosi, who was killed in an attempted coup of Mugabe in 2013.The killing of the nine workers at Marikana was allegedly at the hands of police who tried to prevent the planned work stoppage by striking miners in August 2012. During his trial, former police commissioner Bvudzijena said: "I plead guilty to having committed the murder and I don't plead to having wanted to murder them." A few days later, he also said: "I would plead guilty to having been one of the officers who participated in the massacre of our fellow brothers and sisters at Marikana." The judge says these statements are meaningless. South African police make fun of the self

What's new:

Laser Maze is a collection of laser arcade games developed and published by Pac-Man Production in 1984. It was co-created by Hasegawa and two of his students and was ported to numerous home computers, including the Commodore 64, PET, Atari 800, and TI-99/4A. The home computers were not commercially successful. The color version of the Laser Maze series was called Turbo Laser, and has since been ported to more video game consoles. Gameplay In Laser Maze and its sequel, each player controls a space laser-firing sphere. On the left side of the screen are three rows of power-ups called laser-heads; in the middle are an invisible "power meter" and a left-hand joystick; to the right are five rows of lasers. The four types are similar in appearance and function but make different types of noise. Each power-up also has its own firing rate; for example, a large laser ball, which holds two power-ups, is faster than a small laser ball, which holds one power-up. While every laser can be fired at every power-up, only one power-up can be fired at a time; allowing a player to use as many power-ups as he or she pleases. When a player hits an onscreen ball, he or she collects a power-up. If the ball completely covers a laser, the laser disappears. If it hits an "X" in a box, the player loses a life. After a ball is hit, players may aim between the rows of lasers using the left side of the joystick, where it moves left and right on a diagonal path while others fire from the opposite side. An invisible laser will shoot from the middle of the screen, hitting the ball once it moves beyond a special code box on the right side. Successfully hitting the ball within a code box will reveal a power-up immediately. If the ball lands in the main drop, an audio-visual warning will appear, dropping the next ball that is successfully hit directly above. Power-ups can only be collected once per game, after which the laser again loses its power. Players try to have laser-balls hit the power-ups in the middle. If a player gets enough points, his or her name will appear on the bottom of the screen, however this requires 50 balls be hit to appear. When two or more players have appeared, the game display will split into two screens. A
