As a car manufacturer that has been accused of trying to sell everyone sub-par devices, Honda has a more sinister problem to overcome with the release of the 2020 Fit. The eco-evolution Fit's "creeper" rear lights have been banned by the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. According to Bloomberg, Honda's 2020 Fit was the first model to have been found by the NHTSA to not comply with government safety guidelines. But the end of the show doesn't mean that the Fit is going to be completely ignored by Honda. It will continue to be one of its top models. Bloomberg cites CNBC's American Honda CEO Jeff Hollister, who says Honda will do what it can to repair the company's reputation. So Honda is not going to stop selling the Fit, at least not completely. Honda's 2020 Fit (Honda) It does appear that Honda will stop advertising it. According to Automotive News, Honda plans to stop selling the 2020 Fit in the fall and will only continue to offer the vehicle as a lease program. The company may even make the lease program exclusive to Asian markets. Unfortunately, that means a lot of people will be buying the Fit in the meantime. The 2019 Fit received mixed reviews, which could give these customers some bad sentiment to build towards. Honda's "eco-evolution" headlights alone earned it the nickname of the Creepy Fit. Honda's marketing department had hoped the term "eco-evolution" would tie in with the Fit's eco-friendly aspirations while also giving the car a fresh look. But the new Fit's headlights are just as familiar looking as the 2017 model
