The quest for the Red Hood first began as a big project. While I was searching for a decent graphic engine to make a decent 3D game, I was struggling to find a decent engine. After a while of playing with the various engines that were on the market I couldn't find the engine that suited my needs. That is when I found Ardor3D, an engine with a very versatile development environment. I found that Ardor3D offers a very fast and responsive engine with many add on features. The engine itself is very easy to work with and makes the process of building a game with it a lot of fun. After a while of working with Ardor3D I discovered that I like building games with it and that Ardor3D gives me creative control in the way the game is developed. That is when I started to feel that the projects I am working on would end up having a twist that I am looking for. The first project I thought about was The Red Hood, which is a thrilling story that I really enjoyed playing. I started to develop a base concept of how the game would play and what the story was. The final game is a first person horror game where the main character is lost in the woods and you are not alone, there is a serial killer with a wolf mask and your main goal is to avoid him. What's new in The Red Hood:

and the Outlaws Trailer Released in August to mass acclaim, the first entry in DC Comics' Comics Producers Guild-nominated line of Batman, The Killing Joke tells the story of the DC Universe's ultimate hero facing the terrifying repercussions of his first successful attempt at "a thing we call killing." A graphic novel adaptation of the acclaimed, critically acclaimed anti-hero's 1981 story, The Killing Joke employs the combined talents of writer Brian Azzarello and artist Javier Pulido to bring the inexorable estrangement between the Dark Knight and his trusted ally and former sidekick to vivid, painful life. The comics industry in Canada is about to become a lot less diverse. As of October 1st, Canadian comic book stores will be required to post bilingual comic book content quotas. The goal of this legislation is to encourage diversity among publishers. But we don't agree. We want (and you can agree with us). Comic books and graphic novels are as Canadian as maple syrup (or subsidized electricity) and fish & chips (or subsidies for heavy industry) and they have been for a long time. They also a a multi-billion dollar industry. We're excited to be going into the next few years as one of the few countries where printed word (other than music) really matters—making some of the best stories on the planet. Comics are not junk, but rather an integral part of our culture & history. Part of the Canadian experience. It's not just hippies having wooden boobs. And company reps, and of course, the whole Canadiana Borg and ICE Androids will all be affected by the new regulations. But that's the way we love Canada. As of October 1st, comic book stores are required to post bilingual content quotas. No comic book stories can be published unless they are originals by bilingual creators within the store, as well as having print runs of 175k copies within 75km of the store. I'm surprised the government didn't have the foresight to give these regulations a year to go under so the stores would feel obligated to change. As of 3:30am CT on September 27th, here are some reminders of the process we're going to be involved in getting content on the shelves, the confusion we'll all be under, and how you can help.
