I am trying to understand what virtual hard disks are and how they differ from the concept of virtual networks. In my understanding, virtual hard disks allow you to store a single file on the host's OS file system. In other words, they allow you to run a single operating system which has the ability to access the underlying OS files system. A virtual network allows you to allow multiple virtual machines to share the same network address space - i.e. treat the underlying host as a single machine with multiple IP addresses. So do virtual hard disks just extend the same concept as virtual networks? A: e79caf774b
